The Masters Series Concerts (2011-12)

The Masters Series Concerts (2011-12) comprise a series of approximately 50 mostly Sunday afternoon programs at Studio Hollywood (www.studio-hollywood.com), spanning the cycles of piano music of most of the great composers for the instrument, from Bach and the Classical and Romantic masters, to great composers of the 20th Century. The programs are intended to provide guests with 1-2 hours of quality weekly listening in a contemplative setting, surround-ded by the natural beauty that is visible from the recital hall. The performances are intended to be informal but well-prepared offerings, as an interim step toward full concert preparation.

Chopin: The Nocturnes, Mazurkas & Waltzes

The Nocturnes – "Songs of the night", "piano bel canto": such is how Frederic Chopin's Nocturnes are usually described. They are signature Chopin, and among his best known and most beautiful works. The genre of the piano nocturne was created by the Irish composer and pianist John Field (1782-1837), to whom Chopin referred. The nocturne, perfectly suited to the mood of the era, evokes with its very name romantic images of the night, the moon, and all the shades of lyrical and dramatic expression associated with them. Its poetry is shaped by an atmosphere of intimacy and reverie. Works for piano in this idiom were written by others, but it was Chopin, above all, who raised the nocturne to the pinnacle of poetry, becoming its most celebrated master. He composed and published his nocturnes over many years: the first date from 1830 and 1831, the last from 1846. Eighteen nocturnes were published by the composer in the following opuses: 9, 15, 27, 32, 37, 48, 55 and 62. An additional nocturne was published posthumously, opus 72).

Although they evolved in line with Chopin's style, the nocturnes possess a number of constant features. They are typified by a tuneful and ornamented melody, with a left-hand accompaniment based on flat or broken chords. This tunefulness and the rich and refined ornamentation point to the vocal character of the melodic line, bringing to mind the bel canto Italian operatic style (Chopin was a great admirer of Bellini). With regard to their form, most of the nocturnes can be compared to the operatic da capo aria with ornamented reprise: it is a tripartite reprise form, in which the outer sections are characterized by a lyricism and tunefulness, dwelling on a particular mood, whereas the middle section brings turbulent contrast, a dramaticism and animated 'action'. The opposition between tunefulness and agitation remains crucial, although there are works that adhere to a dreamy cantabile throughout. The ornamentation of the nocturnes evolved over successive opuses, gradually becoming an increasingly integral element of the melody and a source of rich coloration, and not only an exterior addition. The nocturne idiom also influenced other works, including some etudes, preludes, ballades, and sonatas.

The Mazurkas – Uniquely Polish dance miniatures, the Mazurkas are the most numerous group of works by Chopin (51, 49 in thirteen opuses, and two published posthumously). Several others remained in manuscript form. Alongside the polonaises, they are the most 'Polish' of Chopin's works. There would be no mazurkas without Polish folk dances and music. With his mazurkas, Chopin forged an unparalleled model of the musical stylization of traditional, national, authentic folk repertory. Chopin composed mazurkas virtually throughout his life, from around 1825 (aged 15) to 1849. These miniatures came to form a weighty tome of the composer's most personal musical inspirations, a lyrical 'journal' of his life. It is perhaps in the mazurkas, more than in any other works, that Chopin allows the listener into his 'heart's sanctuary'. Pianistically uncomplicated, the mazurkas display an inexhaustible wealth of melodic invention and of harmonic, rhythmic and, above all, expressive nuances. They demand of the pianist "at the same time an almost naive freshness and a mature mastery", said Tomaszewski.

Drawing on the Polish traditions of the folk mazurka, but also of the popular and stylized mazurka, the composer made direct reference to three folk dances which he knew well from numerous visits to the Polish countryside: the mazur, kujawiak and oberek. All three are in triple time and have a characteristic rhythm. The mazur, lively and temperamental in character, in a brisk tempo, with a tendency towards irregular accents, forms the basis of many Chopin works.

The kujawiak (from the region of Kujawy), is characterized by a slow tempo, with a tuneful melody. Finally, the oberek is a lively dance in a quick or very quick tempo, with a cheerful or even exuberant character. It is possible to find clear similarities between certain mazurkas and authentic Polish folk tunes, yet Chopin never quoted from an authentic folk melody. To the contrary: in his mazurkas he created a brilliant, sublimated synthesis of many elements of folk provenance, not infrequently combining in a single mazurka features from more than one dance. Indispensable to the interpretation of these works is rubato – the use of free accelerations and decelerations. Chopin usually published mazurkas in sets of three or four to a single opus. His early works in the genre still display clear hallmarks of typical piano miniatures (small dimensions, symmetry of sections), while the late mazurkas turn into expansive 'dance poems', in which Chopin employs exceptionally refined harmonic means-even polyphony.

The Waltzes – The Waltzes are among the best known and loved of Chopin's works. He wrote some 25 works in this format, of which eighteen have survived. Of these eighteen, Chopin opused and intended for publication eight compositions: Opp. 18, 34, 42 and 64; the remaining waltzes were published after the composer's death, including those of Opp. 69 and 70 and the E minor waltz, Op. posthumous. Chopin's waltzes reflect varying styles, as the composer drew on several traditions of this dance. In his youth, he became acquainted with functional waltzes, both in Poland (where "walcerki" were often danced) and in Vienna, during his stay there. Chopin's waltzes were also influenced by Schubert and the music of Weber, especially his famous Invitation to the Dance.

Yet Chopin's waltzes are entirely original in conception, giving us music that is inimitable, recognizable from the very first bars, full of elegance, charm and brilliance, and not infrequently marked by profound expression. There are short pieces, which can be defined as typical dance miniatures, and also more expansive waltzes, with the character of dance sequences. Chopin created some of his waltzes as compositional "gifts", writing them into albums as keepsakes; these belong to the "private" strand in his oeuvre, not intended for publication, and the composer also had no intention of publishing a number of youthful waltzes from his Warsaw period.

Of a different character are the concert waltzes from the "official" strand in the Chopin oeuvre. Their dimensions are larger, and the pianistic splendor incomparably greater. Here the degree of artistic refinement reaches its peak, particularly manifest in the rich melodies and subtle harmonies. Among these eight masterful waltzes, two fundamental character-types are evident. The first, more numerous, is the striking waltz of virtuosic panache - the valse brillante, as the first four (Opp. 18, 34) of the set are classified. This type of composition might begin with a distinctive introduction and end with a virtuosic coda. The second type is melancholic, although it should be remembered that both these types are also present among the waltzes of the "private" strand. For the listener, however, classifications of 'concert' vs 'salon' waltzes are of little significance. Captivated by the magic of Chopin's waltzes, we simply follow the composer's inspiration.
